Deportations in an age of Neoliberalism

by Linda G Allegro

Abstract

Under policies of the new national security regime, undocumented migrants are more susceptible to being stripped of due process, becoming ineligible for basic social services and facing heightened fears of deportation. Central Americans are among the national origin groups with the highest rates of criminal and non criminal forced removals. While the deportation story largely ends for the US once deportees are sent "home", the impact for receiving nations presents an ongoing challenge as new democracies struggle with mounting gang violence contributed by expatriated youth who were "made in the USA". Ill equipped to deal with the rise in organized crime, receiving nations have turned to mano dura or zero-tolerance strategies on the advice of regional enforcement agencies. Here we explore the deportation of undocumented migrants under the new security regime and to responses to deportations in several Central American nations.

Towards Cross-Border Environmental Policy Spaces in North America: Province-State Linkages on the Canada-U.S. Border

(entry to include article abstract or description of resource or overview of research institute and services provided, contact information, etc.)

A growing number of case studies have painted a picture of a burgeoning network of subnational and cross-border regional environmental linkages along the Canada-United States border, a development which may indicate an evolution in governance arrangements such that cross-border environmental policy spaces are being created.
